Chad Henne....what does this mean for Beck?

Miami used a late 2nd pick on Chad Henne.

The QB battle in Miami is now a threesome.

As bad as Miami is going to be next year (Jake Long isn't going to solve their problems alone) the fact that they took a QB in the 2nd rd versus trying to fill one of their million needs is not a great sign.

As many needs as Miami had, this isn't great news for John Beck.

You beat me to it...Henne is the phins 3rd overall pick with Phillip Merling a DE being their 2nd pick.

This just means Beck is going to work even harder to try and get the spot. I would have to agree with you on this Craig...Miami is in trouble again next year...Henne is not that good of a QB. Ya he has the size but I really don't think he is that good. Lets hope Tuna makes up for his stupid mistake and gets a TE or a FB. Cuz I noticed they needed some better blockers in those positions last year

Your wish is granted:

Tuna trades pick for TE

I'm not sure how good Fasano is but he was the 53rd pick in 2006, and he was a Tuna pick. Henne was the 57th. Two players for a 4th round pick seems like a good trade to me. Anyhow, I'm not worried about Beck winning the job, but hopefully he'll have some good hands to catch his passes.

I don't really think this means that the sky is falling for Beck. We all expected the Dolphins to try and pick up a QB sometime. As it is they took the last QB available out of the handful that people were even talking about. Nobody thought Parcells was going to put all of his eggs in the John Beck basket. I don't think there is any way that Henne starts this season unless both Beck and McCown totally flop. This is still a two QB battle with a little extra insurance thrown in for good measure.

The fact they drafted a quarterback isn't so bad until you consider it was the teammate of the #1 overall pick to the same team. Henne isn't bad, but he isn't great either. His profile lists him at 6'2 and 228, which is very similar to John Beck, maybe a few pounds heavier. John has a strong arm as well so physically speaking John shouldn't be too threatened. And we know Beck has great work ethic and smarts. The only thing that concerns me is if Parcells is looking to maximize his #1 pick by giving him a former teammate to work with as added chemistry and motivation. I don't expect Henne to win the job over John, but it definitely makes things a bit more interesting in Miami.

I don't think so. You can expect Henne to make the same kind of mistakes John made his Rookie year and then some. John is a much more polished passer. The only thing Chad has on John is size (and not much). John has everything else.

I fail to see how playing with a familiar QB helps a lineman play better. It seems like you either block your man or you don't. You never see who's behind you or what he's doing so what's the diff? Maybe playing with fellow OL.

John is basically in the driver seat here. He's been in the system the longest (even if that system has changed), he's got the support of most if not all of his teammates (or those that are left), and it's not lost on the organization how hard he works. I would expect to see their faith in him strengthened as the offseason and camps start up. This is the NFL, they're not going to not play the best QB they have on roster. If that's not John come opening day, then it's nobody's fault but his own.

I disagree. I see this as a bad sign for Beck. Henne will be a good pro QB. No matter how much potential he has, that a team with so many holes decided to take a QB with their 4th pick is a vote of no-confidence for Beck. Rebuilding with a young QB you figure that a couple of FA veteran QB's can come it to mentor your future QB. You make the position a battle and the team grows together as all the positions come together. However, the other positions are the most important. You focus on shoring up both lines before drafting more QB's.

I think that John's 7 fumbles last year left everybody thinking he's not NFL material.

This guy thinks Parcels has confidence in JB and is just getting another backup... I tend to agree.

I guess my main question is, with all the needs and gaps that Miami had, why use a 2nd round pick on a QB; especially if you only want him to push Beck?

Good news would have been a guard, backup rb, receiver , etc. Drafting Henne is not good news. It's also not the end of the world, but that was a valuable pick they used just to have a 3rd string qb.

Ya craig! seriously...They should of picked up Jacob Hester...That guy is a stud! and he would of been a great blocking back. Oh well I suppose Tuna knows what he is doing

I agree that Henne was a value pick at that spot (but that's only because I like him as a QB). But I find it hard to interpret as a vote of confidence for John Beck. I think the team could be improved more by filling line holes or a WR, or a DB, or well, anything. Either that or Parcels believes the QB is just as much of a weakness. Which it probably is.

I agree that is certainly wasn't a vote of confidence for Beck, but I don't see it as a vote of no confidence either. To me, it is a vote of "we don't know what we have and here is a QB we like at a value pick so we had better take him." I think all that any of us really wanted and expected was for Beck to get a fair shot and not be judged and dismissed based on last year. I don't see drafting Henne as changing that stance, just adding more horses to the stable. Like others have said, if Beck doesn't win the job, oh well. We just want him to have a fair shot, which I think he will get.

How could anyone expect the Dolphins to give a vote of confidence for Beck based on his play last year? He didn't do anything that would indicate that he was the QB of the future. Of course, because he was thrown to the wolves with a severe lack of coaching and severe lack of surrounding talent, the phins are not going to write him off either. It appears that the Dolphins are acting prudently in this manner. They now have three QBs that fit the mold they are looking for, and may the best QB win. If Beck cannot beat out McCown or Henne then he doesn't deserve to start. If anyone is implying that he is not going to get a fair shot, then I think they are mistaken. Beck was highly regarded by Parcels in last years draft. They are going to give him a fair chance at winning the QB job.

Another way of looking at drafting Henne with the third pick is to prove to Beck that he would get a fair shot. They could have gone QB with their first pick of the draft (though that would have been insane), but certainly with their second pick of the draft. Instead, they held off until the third pick--low enough not to be considered a vote of no confidence, but high enough to get a potential starter if necessary.

Also, since Henne was good value at that pick, if he doesn't pan out, they can trade him as a serviceable back-up QB to another team in the future. So, it made sense to take him where they did.

The good thing is that the phins spent a lot of picks bolstering the offensive and defensive lines, picking up another big bruising RB and a big bruising FB. It appears the phins will focus on the run this year, which will take a lot of pressure off of Beck or whoever wins the QB position (My guess would be Beck, and if not Beck, then McCown--I doubt Henne gets the nod in his first year). If both lines are bolstered sufficiently this year, then next year you can expect the Dolphins to pick up some skill position players to round out the offense (they badly need a #1 receiver) and draft some CBs and Safeties to help out the secondary.

I think Beck's future is still wide open. It will be whatever he makes of it.

Kinda like having an ace in the pocket...it does not hurt to have a good player that can be of "worth" to someone else for a future trade.
